1. Alex begins his day with some coffee. Then he takes a short walk in a nearby park before heading to work. But he doesn't need to go far. He just walks back home, opens up his laptop, and gets started. Alex works from home every day. You might think this sounds great. After all, many people don't like their offices. At home, they can make things exactly how they like. But many workers actually find working from home to be more stressful. Alex says this is true for him. He explains, "It's like the workday never ends. When I used to go to an office, I'd leave work and not think about it until the next day. Now, I answer emails and texts at all hours of the day."

2. Working from home is becoming more common and even normal in some industries. For employers, it saves money. They don't need to pay for office space. They also don't need to spring for things like office parties, or provide places like game rooms where workers can relax. And then workers save a lot of time. In most countries, workers need 30 to 60 minutes to get to work. Working from home means you get an hour or two of extra time each day.

3. But, as we can see with Alex, it's not perfect for workers. That's why businesses should still try to reduce workplace stress. One idea is to provide online meditation classes. Workers can do something quiet together that helps them improve their attention.
Another idea is to just make a rule that says workers can't send emails after a certain time. Working from home certainly has its advantages, but it's not without problems. Ideas like these, though, can make it much better.

Question 1: How much time do workers need to get to work in most countries?

Question 2: Workers who take online meditation classes

Question 3: In paragraph 2, why does the writer mention not needing to provide places for workers to relax?
