Read the following passage carefully then answer questions from 1 to 10 below:

1. The stress of modern jobs can make it challenging for employees to focus while they are working. This stress may also lead to employees getting sick more often or even quitting. When this happens, employers must use time and resources to find and train new employees.

2. Popular solutions for this problem may include buying plants for the office, providing lunches on birthdays, creating game rooms, and hosting meditation classes. These solutions may help some employees, but they don't give a boost to everyone. Some employees, for example, say meditation doesn't support them at all and adds to their stress. They spend the whole time thinking about the problems in their lives, and it's hard to stop thinking about them when they return to work afterwards.

3. In fact, the best solutions for workplace stress tend to happen spontaneously. Carefully planned solutions can feel like more work for employees, while those that happen in the moment tend to be more effective and enjoyable.

4. So, for example, instead of carefully planning a party, buying gifts, or building a game room, be ready to act quickly when you hear a good idea. Someone might say, "I wish I could try every cake at that café." Suddenly, the boss could say, "That's a great idea! Let's all go do it right now!" Imagine working somewhere where fun things like that could happen at any moment. That doesn't sound like a stressful workplace at all!
